- Personal belongings comprise all articles which the passenger can transport in the cabin without being tagged and weighed. Corendon Airlines is under no circumstances responsible for transportation of forbidden materials.

- For transportation of dangerous materials for commercial purposes cargo@corendon-airlines.com needs to be contacted so that transportation regulations are obeyed and permission is granted.

- Electronic Devices

- It is most important that the crew's instructions regarding the use of electronic devices in the cabin are obeyed.
- PED (Personal Electronic Device) is a for consumers produced electronic device. They may be carried as cargo, or on board in the cabin of the aircraft by the crew and by passengers, without any necessary approval.
- Most of the electric apparatus can be classified in this category, including devices working on batteries, or using an energy source available in the aircraft. PEDs are divided into 3 categories:

1. PED: devices that transmit few signals, often only commanded by the user, such as photo camera's, radio receivers, audio and video players, electronic games and toys and in the aircraft available equipment used by the crew while working.

2. T-PED: (Transmitting PED) electronic devices transmitting via an antenna electronic magnetic waves with high frequency energy output. Examples of T-PED are radiographic commanded remote controls (such as controls for toys), walkie-talkies, mobile phones, satellite phones, computer with a mobile telephone data port, wi-fi and bluetooth equipped devices. Devices, transmitting frequencies, such as mobile phones are classified as PED when they are in "flight mode". During certain periods of the flight passengers may use them, but these devices should be turned off during take-off and descent.

3. C-PED (Controlled PED) apparatus under the supervision and application of Corendon Airlines. C-PED's can be classified as PED or as T_PED. A mobile phone in "flight mode" may be used during certain periods of the flight, but should be off during take-off and descent.

- Even if they are turned off, most PEDs are still connected to their energy source and therefore certain functions continue to work, such as the built-in clock, or databank.
- Wrist watches use batteries, but they do not transmit any signals, so the "turn off" rule is not applicable for them. For safety reasons, mobile phones and other electronic devices should be turned off during take-off and landing as soon as the "fasten your seatbelt" light turns on.
- Mobile devices may be used in "flight mode" after take-off as soon as the "fasten your seatbelt" sign is off, until this sign is on again.
